

Angela Gonzales is an Assistant Professor in Development Sociology at Cornell, who received an Ed.M. (Education), M.A. (Sociology), and Ph.D. (Sociology) from Harvard. Her dissertation, “American Indian Identity Matters: The Political Economy of Ethnic Boundaries,” examines how American Indian individual and collective self-understanding has been shaped by the complex form and acceptance of legal definitions that the United States government holds unique relationship to American Indians. Recent publications include: “American Indians: America’s Most Rural Population”, in Challenges for Rural America in the Twenty First Century; “Tribal Membership or National Citizenship?: The Ideological Origins of Tribal Citizenship”, in Tribes Moving Forward: Engaging in the Process of Governmental and Constitutional Reform; “Urban (Trans)Formations: Changes in the Use and Meaning of American Indian Identity”, in American Indians and the Urban Experience. Her research focuses on two distinct but related areas—changes in the use and meaning of indigenous individual and collective/communal identity and the expansion and development of tribal government gaming. The common thread uniting these lines of research is her interest in the sociological processes underlying development and contemporary constructions of identity in the United States.
